CS209 Web Development Using FrontPage: Project

Course Description

This course is a study of the principles and practices for designing, developing, and deploying multi-page web sites with the use of the Microsoft FrontPage integrated development environment (IDE) tool. Students will explore the design and development of navigation structures that depicts the relationship between the pages on a web site. They will design navigation systems to enhance the user access across the whole web site. They will also use themes to implement a consistent and professionally designed user interface across the web site. Students will add images, image maps, and thumbnails to enhance the user-application interaction. They will examine the procedures and policies as related to creating and formatting tables, frames, and data entry forms. They will also examine about the process and practices for implementing a web site including: registering a domain name, selecting an ISP, opening the website at the host ISP, publishing the website, and configuration management. The student will assess dynamic web templates as a tool to standardize, format, and control the content of multiple pages in the website. They will also enhance web pages by adding Microsoft Office components to the page. Students must have access to Microsoft FrontPage 2003 (or higher) software. (Prerequisite: CS121)
